STIRRING THINGS UP

By C. HAMBURG.

"By the way," said Harstetter, in the middle of a peaceful dinner at his country cottage, "I asked the Powells to come across the lake with me next Saturday. I thought we ought to have them."

Presently the dead silence caused him to look up from his salad. "What's the matter?" he inquired in astonishment.

Mrs. Harstetter was gazing at him with a tragedy face. "James Harstetter," she got out at last, "I should think you would have known better! Why, this week I'm getting ready to close the cottage for the winter—and we're all going back with you next Monday—and the cretonnes will all be down and the house looks like fury without them—and the curtains—and Mrs. Powell has never been here, and what on earth will she think of the place? With the geranium boxes all emptied and everything! And eating the scraps and canned stuff that's left—oh, I could shake you!"

"I didn't think," said Harstetter. His appetite, however, seemed quite unimpaired by the turn affairs had taken.

"They'll want to go walking and see things and go fishing and goodness knows what else—and there's all that canned fruit for you to crate. How are you going to crate fruit when you've got to sit on the front porch being a pleasant little host to a great big fat man like Mr. Powell, who wants to smoke cigars and have refreshing drinks served to him all the time and have the women sitting around languidly ready to talk and keep him amused. If it had to be some one why couldn't you have picked out any one else on earth but the Powells? I do believe there is something left out of a man's brain that women have, some sixth sense that should keep them from doing foolish things! You are just like a little boy—the present moment is all you can manage!"

"I Just Hate You!"

"I am sorry," said Harstetter, "to have stirred up such a commotion." Mrs. Harstetter sighed in an outraged manner. "What good does that do?" she exploded. "How easy life would be if all of us went ahead and did just as we chose with no consideration for any one else's comfort or wishes or convenience, just because we could say afterward that we were sorry and that would make it all right! I believe I'll try it, and see how you like it, James Harstetter. You'll come home some night and find there isn't any dinner and I'll say: 'Dear me! I didn't have time to order it because I wanted to go to a bridge party—I'm so-o-o sorry!'"

"That would be no excuse for not providing a hungry man with his dinner," said Harstetter.

His wife made inarticulate sounds in her throat. "You are perfectly maddening!" she said. "There is no reason why the same allowances shouldn't be made for me that you expect me to make for you. All the good sheets are in the wash this coming week and Mary'll be good and angry when I tell her she has to wash out some ahead of time so I can fix up the guestroom bed! And it's so hard to keep servants contented here in the country. I should think you would have thought of that! I just know Mrs. Powell will sniff at the simplicity of the place—though when the cretonnes are up and the flower boxes are filled it isn't so bad. I hate to have people see the place when it isn't at its best. Honestly, I could cry!"

"Don't cry," said Harstetter. "What's the use?"

"How are we going to get them here now that the ferry's stopped? Could you expect Mrs. Powell, in something perfectly lovely from Paris, to walk a quarter of a mile through the sand and come across the lake in a row-boat as you do, James Harstetter? She'll hate us!"

"Well," said Harstetter, cheerfully, "now that you've got your blood circulating—you said you were chilly when we sat down to dinner—I'll mention that that's precisely what Mrs. Powell did! She very sweetly declined the invitation, because she said she knew you'd be so busy packing up!"

"Jimmy Harstetter, I just hate you," exclaimed his wife.—Chicago Daily News.
